Chat with the Chappie

School holidays... some of us celebrate, some of us groan! I have to admit it is a bit of both for me. I love the break from busy mornings, I love not having to rush to afternoon activities or do school pickups; I love having time to chill out and watch movies with the kids and to have pyjama days! What I don't love is the arguing, fighting and disagreements; or the piles of extra food that gets eaten (3 teenagers!). I don't love the temptation my kids have to get hooked on technology and the pain of having to drag them away from it.

There are positives and negatives to many things in life and school holidays are one of those things! Some of the biggest issues my kids have with each other during the school holidays is when 'their space' gets invaded. Have you ever heard your kids yelling 'get out of my room'? Probably a somewhat familiar phrase in most households.

So why do kids 'invade' each others space? Occasionally it's just to annoy, but even underneath that there is usually a reason. Consider why we as adults seek out company? Imagine that we all have a 'love tank'. We all need to feel loved and connected. It is through interactions with those we love that we fill that love tank. You may have heard the concept of quality time and quantity time. When it comes to filling our love tanks, we need both. The same goes for our kids. When they are hassling a sibling and wanting to be in their room, you will often find that they are just seeking to fill their love tank. This is not usually a conscious thing. They don't say to themselves, "my love tank is on empty, I think I'll go poke my sister and annoy her in her room until she hangs out with me for awhile"! Or, "I'm going to go start drawing on the wall so that Mum will see and come hang out with me and give me a big cuddle".

So, these holidays, when things start to get tense at home, when there's niggling and annoying, encourage your kids to stop what they're doing and take 15 minutes to fill their younger siblings love tank up a bit. This may help to stop some of the negative interactions. Turn off the T.V, the computer or your phone and hang out with your child. Do something with them that they enjoy. Keep it simple, read a book together, throw a ball to each other in the backyard, cook a cake, do some gardening or colour in.

As you do these things and help your kids get on board with the concept, you'll find out something pretty great...your own love tank gets filled too ☺

Character Awards:

Congratulations to Izzabella and Nicholas for receiving the student character awards this week.
